What is plagiarism?

According to the St. Martin’s Handbook, “To plagiarize is to use other people’s ideas or words without acknowledging the source.” The rule for avoiding plagiarism is straightforward: Any source that requires credit in written form should be acknowledged in oral form. In general, you should cite your sources whether you are quoting directly or paraphrasing.

How do I avoid plagiarism within my paper?

Of course, in writing, the rules are more established. To avoid plagiarism in your writing, you should adapt your work to a particular writing style format (APA, MLA, CBE, Chicago, Turabian). You should reference the sources within your speech as well as in a reference page at the end of the document. Some styles require footnotes or endnotes, but regardless of the style, you are required to cite any information that you find to support your ideas (this includes paraphrasing as well as directly quoting).

How do I avoid plagiarism in a presentation?

One of the keys to successful writing and speaking is having support material to back up your arguments. It is equally essential to let your audience know exactly where you got your information. You do not have to include entire references in your oral presentations, but you must refer to your sources while speaking. As a rule, give your audience enough information about your sources such that they can track down the information on their own. That generally means that you need source titles, authors, and dates—not page numbers, volume numbers, web addresses, etc.
How do I cite sources within my speech?

- Direct Quotations: These should be acknowledged in your speech or presentation either as “And I quote...” or “As [the source] put it...”

- Book: Include title and author: “According to April Jones, author of Readings on Gender...”

- Journal: Include journal title, date, and author: “Morgan Smith writes in the Fall 2005 issue of Science...”

- Website: For organizational or long-standing website, include title: “The center for Disease Control web site includes information...”

  For news or magazine websites, include title and date: “CNN.com, on March 28, 2005, states...” (Note: CNN is an exception to the “don’t use the address” rule because the site is known by that name.)

- Interviews, lecture notes, or personal communication: Include name and credentials of source: “Alice Smith, professor of Economics at USM, had this to say about the growth plan...” or “According to junior Speech Communication major, Susan Wallace...”

Remember...

Keep in mind that it’s easy to start falling into the “According to...” broken record. In order to avoid this routine, try to change it up a bit each time with phrases like, “This is also supported by...” “April Smith, founder of... says,” etc. You can also note when large sections of your presentation come from one source (as long as it is clear to the audience).

Also, it might be helpful to include a bibliography at the end of your PowerPoint presentation or in a handout if you feel that the audience should see the full citation. If you use this option, leave that screen up long enough for the audience to read.

Finally, citations are important to make your speech sound credible. Like your papers, it is always better to over-cite than to under-cite.
